

ABSTRACT

Most statistical effort in observational studies for causal effects is directed at methods of analysis. In contrast, I believe that most statistical effort in such studies should be directed at their design, with outcome data entirely unavailable for examination, just as with the design of randomized experiments. This position will be developed and illustrated with the design of an observational study in the tobacco litigation based on the National Medical Examination Survey.